The Soul as Transformative Process

We are apt to forget that matters of the soul are processes of experience, that is, transformations, which should not be unequivocally designated if one does not want to petrify the living movement into something static.

Carl G. Jung, Alchemical Studies, par. 199

In his search to understand the nature of soul, or psyche, Jung found surprising assistance from medieval alchemy in its portrayal of soul as a naturally transformative process. Jung's theory of soul finds additional support today from new science, modern psychoanalytic theory and studies of mysticism.

In this program we will explore the transformative dynamics of the soul as they manifest in our individual and relational experiences, as well as in nature itself. We also consider the role of attachment and detachment in the process of transformation.

The Bollingen lecture was named after the "confession of faith in stone," as Jung called his tower – the house he built for himself at Bollingen. Over the years, as he would begin to feel the house was incomplete, he would add rooms and courtyards, even an upper story. Jung said he felt most deeply himself at Bollingen.

Friday Lecture, Oct. 10
7 pm – 9 pm
Registration begins at 6:30 pm

This lecture provides an introduction to the view of soul as transformative process and to the role of attachment and detachment in transformation.

2 CEUs for psychologists, counselors and social workers (see registration form)

Saturday Workshop, Oct. 11
9:30 am – 12:30 pm
Registration begins at 9:00 am

This program develops in depth the notions of attachment and detachment with particular attention to major alchemical processes as they are reflected symbolically in art, dream material and our own life experiences.

To Jung, the central alchemical notions of conjunctio and separatio clarified the significance of attachment and detachment in spiritual and psychological development. These dynamics find their corollary in the mystical processes classically called the via positiva and via negativa.

3 CEUs for psychologists, counselors and social workers (see registration form)

Richard J. Sweeney, PhD

A valued and greatly anticipated lecturer, Richard Sweeney has a gift for helping people understand Jungian concepts more clearly and deeply.

A Jungian psychoanalyst and licensed professional clinical counselor in private practice in Columbus, he holds a doctoral degree in psychology and religion from the Graduate Theological Union, Berkeley and a diploma in analytical psychology from the C.G. Jung Institute, Zurich.

He continues to serve as a member of the international faculty wing of the C.G. Jung Institute in Zurich.

Dick resides in Columbus, Ohio, with his wife, Ellen, also a Jungian analyst, and his son, Nick, a senior in high school.
